11 March 1999 – Alexandria University
Alexandria - Egypt
Faculty of Fine Arts, Décor Department, Interior Architecture Section.
Ph. D in interior architecture field under title: “the functional and aesthetical values of entrances in interior architecture”.

The relation between human behavior & the surrounding environment – considered being one of the vital problems, which faces the designing process. And without understanding & studying this relationship – the result will be either a progressive design meets the human requirements or not. So, the human behavior analysis must take in mind this complicated relationship between individual & group human behavior limit in a specific time & place. – So, the information needed then I motion information involved with the predictable behavior for users during using the interior space. That is why the interior designer must realize that the main reason is that enhance the success of any design. Is the ability to manage the behavior & emotional needs & desires of users with as optimum effectiveness as possible and its relationship with the surrounding environmental & social conditions?
